Fail Fast, Fail Often: How Losing Can Help You Win

Fail-fast fundamentals Assertions are the key to failing fast. An assertion is a tiny piece of code that checks a condition and then fails if the condition isn't met. So, when something starts to go wrong, an assertion detects the problem and makes it visible. Most languages have built-in assertions, but they don't always throw exceptions. They're also usually pretty generic, limiting expressiveness and causing duplication. For these reasons, I usually prefer to implement my own ...

Thinking Fast and Slow Book Summary - Words in, words out

Thinking, Fast and Slow is a masterpiece written by the Nobel Laureate, Daniel Kahneman; in here, he is targeting human irrationality. He starts with the book by naming the two parts of a brain as System I and System II, where System I, is the "intuition part", which operates automatically most of the times and is without logic; while System II denotes effortful mental activity, involving logics.
